Connecticut Sports Law Celebrates First Anniversary

FRIDAY March 13, 2009: Connecticut's first blog covering the intersection of sports and the law, Connecticut Sports Law (<http://ctsportslaw.com>), celebrates its first anniversary today.

Published by Daniel B. Fitzgerald, an associate at the Connecticut law firm of Updike, Kelly & Spellacy, P.C., the blog covers a variety of issues relating to sports law and business. Most recently, Connecticut Sports Law examined Jim Calhoun's value to the University of Connecticut in "Jim Calhoun and the Flutie Effect" and discussed the matter of Oliver v. NCAA in "Court Throws Out NCAA Baseball Lawyer-Agent Rule."

"Connecticut Sports Law covers issues largely ignored by the mainstream sports media, and provides a unique perspective to its readers" said Robert Romano, a Connecticut attorney and President of the Romano Sports Agency. "This blog really appeals to sports fans, student-athletes and sports professionals who want more than just the scores."

During its first year, four Connecticut Sports Law articles were published in Sports Litigation Alert and Legal Issues in Collegiate Athletics, leading publications in the sports law field. The blog was also featured in the Connecticut Law Tribune article "Inside the Wide World of Sports Law."
